Category:Video game companies of GermanyThe embodiments herein relate to methods and systems for content search. Content search is the practice of analyzing, filtering, and presenting content, such as documents, stored on a computer system. Content search is utilized by various electronic devices, such as a desktop computer, a personal digital assistant (PDA), a web-enabled cell phone, a personal computer, a television, a library, or the like. The content can include information, such as books, articles, web pages, multimedia files, music files, financial data, medical files, images, graphics, and videos. The content of the data can be searched in real time or a batch process can be conducted. For example, a content search may include a user query and information can be searched according to the user query. Content search allows a user to conduct a search of data using a query. In some embodiments, the query can be user-generated (e.g., by a user typing words into an input device of a computer system) or can be from an external source (e.g., an Internet search or an information sharing search). In another embodiment, a third party program can provide a query to a content search engine to search a content database for documents, files, multimedia data, and the like. The search results can be ranked based upon the relevance of the search results to the provided query. As a result, an electronic device can provide search results based upon the user's query. Content search engines can provide a list of search results that include content or objects related to the query. In the list of the search results, the search results can be ranked based upon the relevance of the content to the query. In general, the relevance of a particular item to the query is determined based on the similarity of content in the particular item to the content included in the query. In some embodiments, the content can include an index or some other structure for storing information about the content. In some embodiments, the index can include terms or words that are associated with the content. In some embodiments, the content can include words in the original text or some other representation of the content. In some embodiments, the index can include a word count for the content. In some embodiments, the content can include information about the content and the content can include one or more objects. In some embodiments, the content can include a numerical value, such as a word count or other characteristics. Content search engines can determine the relevance of content to a query
